Getty Images Ready for a pop (cross) quiz? Yep, experts say that there's some personal stuff you should know about your partner, which is why WH put together some-good, ton-pairs issues to see if you have some work to do. And hey, it's good if you fail. By asking your partner some tough questions there is only a chance to be vulnerable, which is when you both can be your authentic selves, says Janet Brito, a clinical psychologist and sexologist in Honolulu. Consider this pairs quiz opp do just that. This content is being imported from {embed-name}. You may find the same content in a different format, or you may find more information on your website. Okay, so here's how this pairs quiz works: Both you and your partner must have copy pairs of questions below. Answer each question based on what you think your partner's answer would be. When you are finished, take turns revealing them to each other. If any of you get the question wrong, it gives you both the opportunity to talk things through in a neutral, comfortable way. And when do you get the answers right? Well, you two can relax easily knowing you're in sync (aw). Warm-Up QuestionsLet answer some easier, growerless questions before we dive into the harder ones. While they can be fun knowing the basic facts about your partner at least suggest, you pay attention to what they say, do, and enjoy. Let's see how well you remember this: What's your partner's favorite TV show? What is your partner's favorite book? What food would your partner like to cook? What's their favorite color? Where did you two meet? What color are their eyes? Questions about the future Sure, you guys are in love now. But if you're planning on staying together forever, there's a lot you should talk to make sure you're on the same page. To find out the current state of mind regarding their dreams is important, says Gigi Engle, resident womanizer sexologist and author of All All F*cking Mistakes: A Guide To Sex, Love, and Life. It shows where they are in the direction and drive, both key things in building a long-term partnership. When it comes to the future, here's what you should ask: What does your partner want their life to look like in five years? Where do they see themselves living in an ideal world? Will your partner ever move to adapt to your work? Does your partner ever want a long-distance relationship? Does your partner want to marry in the future? How happy are they with their current working situation? How does your partner feel about having children? Does your partner want your home one day? Would your partner like to talk about the future? Why and why not? Knowing what you're going for is important. Questions about the past Like talking about the future, it's important there's also a lot you should know about your partner's past. A person's childhood sets the stage for their emotional well-being for the rest of his life, says Engle. The messages we perceive from our primary caregivers form our fundamental beliefs about the world. Knowing what you're going is important. Here's what you should ask about your partner's past: What kind of relationship does your partner have with your parents? What relationship does your partner have with your brothers and sisters? Do they still have to communicate with any friend from childhood? Did they have a positive high school experience? Do their parents support their dreams and goals? How was their college experience? Does your partner get excited about visiting the home? How does your partner feel about their exes? Do they believe they have been able to maintain a positive romantic relationship? Do they have any past experience with mental health issues? Questions about values According to Brito, many arguments in relationships lead to couples having conflicting values. You want to see if someone's values match you, adds Engle. This is a key factor in compatibility. You should not change yourself to fit someone else's ideals, and visa versa. What is your partner's political convictions? How important is the family to your partner? How much does your partner rate to measure physical activity? What does your partner prefer to do with your time off? Would your partner like to travel? How does your partner feel about having pets? Does your partner donate to charity? What are the most important people in your partner's life? What is your partner's favorite thing about your job? How would your partner like to spend your money? Questions About communicationWhen what comes to relationships, communication is "always" key. It is important to know when your partner needs space and proximity, rather than take it personally, says Brito. Answer these questions to find out how well you know your partner's communication style: Does your partner consider himself an introvert or extrovert? How does your partner prefer to show affection? (Touch me? Gifts? Legislation does your partner prefer to receive affection? Can your partner easily identify their feelings? How does your partner define an argument? What does your partner want to talk about at the end of each day? Does your partner like to communicate by phone? (Text? FaceTime?) FaceTime?) How does your partner nurture uncomfortable topics? This content is being imported from {embed-name}. You may find the same content in a different format, or you may find more information on your website. People have different beliefs about kinks, desires, habits, and libidos, says Engle. Here's what you should know: What does good sex look like for your partner? Does your partner enjoy using sex toys? How does your partner feel about watching? What is your partner's favorite sex position? How does your partner feel about using lube? How adventurous is your partner in the bedroom? How does your partner determine romance? Now that you've answered all your couples' questions, it's time to reveal your answers to your partner. Remember: It's good if you have some wrong! Consider being able to talk with tough stuff. You may be able to find more information about this and similar content piano.io I get an amazing number of questions that either (1) I can't answer without knowing much more detail than the reader gives, (2) the reader can answer as easily as I can, or (3) involves asking SmarterTravel.com do something we don't do. Here are answers to common questions: Reading the answers before you ask any of these questions will save you time and help you find the answer on your own. Where are we going to go? I need a 600-page book or an all-day discussion to answer this question in any useful way. To have any help at all, I first need to know quite a bit about you: what kind of family or group you have, what are your interests, how much time you have, what are your budget goals or limitations, whether you want luxury or simplicity, whether you want bright lights or solitude, what kind of activities you are interested in, what kind of climate you want, or your grandkids or your dog will go with you , and on and on. Surprisingly, some readers who ask about where to go don't even tell you where they live and will start their journey. Sorry, folks, the only way I can help is when you submit questions that are much more specific. If you're absolutely sure of what you want to do, my best suggestions are that you (1) read a lot of travel publications, (2) apply for a lot of destination websites, and (3) find a good travel agent who is qualified for handling issues like this. When should we visit? As with where to matter, the best time to visit the issue depends on how you define the best time: lowest prices, minimum the widest range of activities, the warmest/coldest/driest/wettest climate, and beyond, and beyond. Next. cost point of view, the answer is almost always in the low season, but it might not be what you really want. What is the fee? I'm getting this one probably more than anyone else, and it's a bit surprising. If you get as much as AskEd & AnswerEd, you're certainly already SmarterTravel.com. And right there, our bright new website, in the upper right corner, is our own ticket search gateway: you can search for airline tickets, hotel, car rental, vacations, and cruise fares. If you don't like our search system, there are dozens of others. I don't think we have secret ways to get off airfares not for you; we do not do this. We have to go through the same kind of search for what you do. If you're asking about a trip that ordinary U.S.-based search engines don't handle, a good place to try is ETN, where you can submit a trip anywhere in the world and have ticket agents respond with their best offers. And if you start your trip in another country, you get the best bet is to find a local discount travel agency, online or offline, in that country. Can you arrange my trip/sell me a ticket? No. SmarterTravel.com not arrange trips or sell tickets. Any tickets. If you're only looking for schedule information, scroll to the top round of Travel Tools, where flight schedules are one of the options in the drop-down menu. Other options include a hotel finder and links to service providers that sell all types of travel. What are the requirements? Quite a few readers ask about the different requirements and restrictions, especially about air travel, but also about travel documents. You could answer almost all these questions by simply googling the question. Here are places to look for some of your most frequently asked questions: Airline baggage restrictions: each airline has more information about their online baggage policy. Just log on to the airline site and look for a link to your luggage. If you don't see it in the drop-down menu, go to Site Search or Site Map. (By the way, when you look, the official term is baggage, not baggage. Luggage is what you buy in the store; when you put your stuff in it and take it on a trip, it becomes baggage.) Allowable goods in the luggage carried: The Transportation Security Administration (TSA) maintains a list of do's and is not for carry-on goods. Passport and visa requirements: The State Department's travel information website has a button to get information about foreign travel for U.S. citizens and other detailed passport information. The information button leads to detailed visa lists to enter any country in the world. Is it safe to visit? No one can answer whether you will be safe visiting any foreign or anywhere in the U.S. for that matter. However, the State Department collects a wide range of data banks about countries around the world, including avoidable spots and more general information about what visitors can Click on Travel Alerts from the State Department travel page for information on hot spots, and sheets in other places. Where should I complain? Most travel suppliers list the address for complaints or at least contact us at the address somewhere on their website. You can find them easily. And you can forget about how to make a big fuss by sending a registered, return receipt letter, or Express Mail to the CEO, it's concluding at the same complaint office. The U.S. Department of Transportation (DOT) makes it easier to appeal your airline. Its website lists the current name, snail mailing address, phone and email address of complaint offices of all important U.S. airlines. If you wish, you can lodge a complaint with the DOT. And DOT also provides a wide range of information about the rights of what you do and not as an air traveler. Traveler.
